COMBO MEALS

Just when a reader sends us what we think is the ultimate meal—a 20-patty-by-20-cheese-slice-monster as seen in December's issue—another fast-food devotee chimes in. "We're all about combining the forces of different restaurants for variety," writes Jay Brewer, creator of Fast Food Fever, a Boston group dedicated to combining menu items from different fast-food restaurants to form Frankenburgers. "Our menu has 14 items, including the Triple Threat, which is a combination of McDonald's, Burger King's and Wendy's biggest burgers," Brewer says.

There's also the Pop 'n' Taco (below), which combines KFC Popcorn Chicken with a Taco Bell Chicken Soft Taco.

"The KenTacoHuts—those KFC-Taco Bell-Pizza Hut restaurants, all under one roof—are the greatest things ever," Brewer says. But he expects the best is yet to come. "Once we get through this whole diet and sue-the-company craze, I think they'll make products that are even fatter and more wonderful. There's going to be a backlash where people say, 'You can't tell us we can't have fast food!' and it's going to come out as giant burgers." Dare to dream.
